Immigrants face many difficult situations because they are overcome by questions in their subconscious which all center on uncertainty. The general public is the audience because both immigrants and us alike face uncertainty in complicated situations. Except in this case, the speaker gives the audience the immigrant's perspective because the speaker is trying to contrast a daily situation to a rare situation that doesn't happen to everyone. The role of music is important because music forms a meaning that helps the public interpret how immigrants face their problems. Music is helpful because the audience can visualize an event as it pertains to the meaning of a single emotion and how the music depicts that emotion through the rhythm of sound.

Uncertainty happens to be the biggest factor to why immigrants face so many problems in the real world. Uncertainty in the song is expressed by the repetitive quote: "There not gonna get us," because they are asking the audience to help them figure out who is after them. The quote above maybe a single question that is taken from an immigrants subconscious thought because it tells you what immigrants think of the most. Questions all lead to uncertainty because at the time you have no answers to what it is you are thinking about. The main reason this quote is chosen is because it easily displays a mental image about what immigrants have to go through. Thus, uncertainty can be easily seen through the minds of the public because most of us are like immigrants to a certain extent.

Comparing the public and immigrants, we find we are the same because we travel to many places and the problems we face are just like the problems immigrant's face. If I were to move to a new state I would have to be used to the environment and the setting of the new state. Just like moving to a new state the immigrants have to get accustomed to their new surroundings and how they interact with their surroundings. The song is used to tell the audience that everyone must deal with change and through change comes problems. In conclusion, music helps the audience receive a more thorough understanding because music is sense of direction.

Instrumentation towards the meaning is very crucial because it helps the audience to visualize the immigrant's reactions. When you watch a movie and you hear the background sound begin to grow louder and you anticipate that something is going to happen. I like to call what I just said an example of a sense of direction because you may turn around and head in another direction. Or seek a better alternative which is mentioned in the song when the speaker says, "We'll run away on roads that are empty." The music grows louder when the speaker mentions that quote because she is suggesting they run away from the unknown person who is after them. This all leads back to the quote, "There not gonna get us" because they sense the danger mounting. Instruments will always have a role when telling you that danger is near because the level of noise will change the way you feel when you look at a situation. In, addition instrumentation formulates a meaning that helps that audience interpret music as an emotion.

Music helps the audience to have a better feel of the immigrants because the instrumentation is used in a way that provokes a feeling. If I were to talk to someone about what I did yesterday you could mentally picture where I was but you wouldn't be able to see my emotions. This example is used to prove one point which is instrumentation helps the audience see the facial expression on the immigrants face as he or she deals with a situation. One difficulty that is seen through the immigrant's facial expression is confusion because they want to know who is after them and ironically so do you. The accompanying instruments in the background help people to see their emotions because of the way the music sets a tone. The tone in the song is high pitched but is very fast and to me that means the immigrants are dealing with too many difficult situations and that causes frustration and confusion. That is the reason behind the quote; "no no I love you," is an expression that the speaker uses to note that emotions always come before a person's decision. In addition, summarizing how immigrants feel, act, interpret, and visualize a difficult event is in relation to how the public mentally visualizes that same event but take a different approach.

Immigrants have many difficult tasks to deal with but are uncertain of how to deal with them because they don't understand the issue. The song focuses on the public because they want the public to be able to see what an immigrant has to deal with as opposed to some of the events we deal with which may be less severe. Instrumentation is used to help the audience both interpret and visualize the world in which immigrants live in and some of the difficulties they must overcome. In conclusion, immigrants and us alike both experience confusing situations that can't be explained because in the real world we don't know what the other person's reactions are.
