Richard L. Fennelly . . . . railroad man

As one looks over the old railroad tracks now running through Frackville, it is hard to imagine that belles on the part of the railroad station and the like as many as a century ago. Many changes have taken place through the years.

Soon after the station was opened in 1880, the railroad officials realized that it would be a need to have someone to answer the needs of the passengers. So a "ticket agent" was stationed at the railroad station. He was there to sell tickets, answer questions, and provide information to the passengers. The ticket agent was a small settlement centered around the railroad station in Frackville.

Steam engines, which were used on the railroad, required daily maintenance to keep them running smoothly. The ticket agent would be responsible for ensuring that the engines were properly maintained.

The agent would also be responsible for keeping track of the passengers who were arriving or departing. He would ensure that the passengers had their tickets ready and that they were boarding the correct train.

The ticket agent would have to be familiar with the rules and regulations of the railroad. He would also need to be able to handle customer complaints and disputes.

The ticket agent's job was a challenging one, but it was also an important one. He played a vital role in the operation of the railroad and was a key player in ensuring that passengers had a safe and comfortable journey.

In conclusion, the railroad ticket agent was a crucial part of the early transportation system in Frackville. His role was essential in ensuring that passengers had a safe and comfortable journey.

Richard L. Fennelly was a ticket agent at the railroad station in Frackville. He was known for his knowledge of the trains and his ability to provide the best service possible to his customers. His dedication to the job made him a popular figure among the passengers who used the station.
